Next, shopping Pu-erh Tea, a popular product from Yunnan. Pu-erh tea can be purchased as either raw/green (sheng) or ripened/cooked (shu), depending on processing method or aging. Sheng Pu-erh can be roughly classified on the tea oxidation scale as a green tea, and the aged-green variants as post-fermented tea. The fact that Pu-erh fits in more than one tea type poses some problems for classification. For this reason, the "green tea" aspect of Pu-erh is sometimes ignored, and the tea is regarded solely as a post-fermented product. Unlike other teas that should ideally be consumed shortly after production, Pu-erh can be drunk immediately or aged for many years; Pu-erh tea is often now classified by year and region of production much like wine vintages.

As such, it influenced the development of several aspects of society including art and design education, international trade and relations, and even tourism. The main attractions at World’s Fairs are the national pavilions, created by participating countries.
